Mad Wolf Attacking a Village-A Town Burned and Lives Lost.
The Russian papers publish an almost incredible story from Russian Lithuania. The following account is from the superintendent of one of the

from the superintendent of one of the largest estates in that region:

On the other side of a little river flowing by the estate of Beresina lies some villages and the forest of Soiki, In the fields between the latter and the village of Pocle a few women were working separately towards evening, when suddenly an unusually large working separately towards evening, when suddenly an unusually large wolfe sprang out of the forest and in few minutes had torn one of the women to pieces. The other women, seeing this event from the distance, burried to the village for aid, but before the men returned the wolf had disappeared. The body of the unfortunate woman presented a horrible appearance. The eldest of the peasants immediately informed the police of the occurrence, and placed six men in the neighborhood of the body to watch over it until the officials came, for a corpse cannot be removed in Runsia before the strival of the police. A few hours later, as the men were lying around a fire, the wolf again appeared, and the peasants made the best of their way to a neighboring house on the edge of the forest. One of the party, a strong peasant, was left best of their way to a neighboring house on the edge of the forest. One of the party, a strong peasant, was left behind by his companions, and was overtaken by the animal and quickly torn to pieces. Immediately streward the owner of the little house, a forest watcher, who was returning to his home, was seized by the wolf, and only reached his dwelling half dead. The brute then went to the villages of Poole and Proranie, attacked a peasant farmhouse, penetrated the dwelling room (which on account of the smoke was usually left open), and wounded men and animals. The wolf their sprang upon the village green, injured three laborers and a number of horses, and thence went to the estate of Bereina, where he lacerated the horses to a fearful extent.

'Altogether the beast wounded ten argest estates in that region :

where he lacerated the horses to a fearful extent.

'Altogether the beast wounded ten animals, and as the servants hurried to the spot, he sprang upon them wounded the head of one, the band of another, and the neck and thigh of the servant girl of a forest watcher named Manklewiez, whose horse she was tending. The wolf then left, and went towards the villages of Chonytony and Makanynienka, killing a women in one, wounding dogs, men and cattle, and then disagraphy and the present of fa few hours the brute had killed three human beings, more or less wounded thirty-one grown up persons, and fifty-four head of cattle.

'But this by no means describes the lajury done, for to all appearances the
woif was affected with hydrophobis.
All the wounded persons agree that the animal had foam upon his mouth, and the tail was hanging down. Only when attacking any one did he raise the latter, and sprang upon the hind legs, always siming at the throat. The strength of the spring may be inferred from the case of a young peasant, who had five teeth knocked in by the jaws of the wolf. It is a very suspicious
circumstance that the wolf did dot eat the bodies, but fell upon them from pare madness. All this happened in the night; the people were seized perfectly unawares, and could do but little in their own defence. Tue, one peasant managed to shout the wolf through one of the hind legs, and another to drive a shoemsker's awi into his carcass during an attack, and though neither of the wounds were faital, they contributed much to the weakening of the beast, which was killed on the following day, in a romarkable manner.

'A great hout was arranged, and peasants from all the surrounding neighborhood streamed toward the rendezvouse near the forest of Solki, peaants from all the surrounding neighborhood streamed toward the rendezvouse near the forest of Solki. Not far from this place, in the middle of the fields, there is a small patch of forest, called the Dombrown. In order to approach this, a division of the peasants crept amid the young firs, endeavoring to approach without being seen. Suddenly one of the peasants thought that another of his companions had selzed him by his furs from behind. Without having the slightest idea of the wolf, he put his hand behind him in a medianical way, and selzed the brute accidentally by the throat. Simultaneously, he saw one of the forepawsis the side, grasped this, and knew that he had to do with the dreaded monster. He mansged to press the brute's back against the trunk of a fire, and held frim there until his fellow peasants—the hol in the first fright had run away—came to his assistance, and killed the animal with their hay and manner forks.

"The dead wolf was found to be of extraordinary size, and light in color. The away with which which he was stabbed the night before was found embedded in his carcase, proving that it was the same-animal—that had already committed—such havoo. The peasant whom the wolf had last selzed was only slightly wounded in the back. Children, fortunately, had not been bitten, for at the late hour when the wolf made his appearance, and aprang into the houses, they were all asleep in their accustomed places—on top of the great ovens. A number of other wolves were seen in the neighborhood at the same upon the scene. The wounded were taken into the school-house, where their wounds were those of a so-called wonder-decort, whose specific for this disease is said previously to have always been successful. The dogs and swine which had been bitten in the villinges were immediately shot. Cattle and horses are now under veer immry treatment. One horse was sehot on the day following the wound, and six others on the day succeeding that, after showing distinct signal of hydrophobis. The greatest excluement pre greatest excitement prevails among the entire population. Nobody will venture into the fields or in the forest in the neighborhood where the misfortime occurred. Nobody will tend the cattle, God grant that the misfortime may not become greater, but that the poor wounded business belongs may be restored to health!

A second fearful item of news from the Rossian press is the burning of the town of Jenissisk, Eastern Siberia, on the 8th of September. The fire originathe sih of September. The fire originated in a turf moor, which had been smouldering for some years, and during a violent storm burst out into a sea of flames, which seized the nearest house about eleven o'clock in the forence, there a preading quickly over the whole city. At eight o'clock in the evening, 1,300 houses (mostly wooden, but thirty-five of great size) six churches, two cloisters, all the stores, and an immense amount of grain

(about two million pounds) were de-atroyed. The fearful rapidity with which the flames apread proyected the people in nearly every case from pre-serving their goods. Over one hundred corpses were found charred in the streets, and as many more are said to have been drowned in the water. Many of the inhabitants fled to the vessels in of the inhabitants field to the vessels in the harbor, but these too were caught up by the flames. The city is now desolate; and its former residents as strewn around in the neighboring vil lages and the various cities of the government.

The Last of the Cottseum:

From the Tribune.

The destruction of the Boston Coliseum, which occurred last week, and which we have already recorded, it must be understood is, this time, a final finisher, the others being pennitimate and ante-pennitimate. This reduction to ruin seems to be regarded in Boston as occasioned by the direct interposition of the gods who were not willing to have this tempte of harmony devoted to any meaner than its original and divine purpose. So . Rolus was ordered to unloose his largest wind-bag, and to blow upon that house so that it should fall. Once he tried it, and once the superpartments our partially yielded to be books boisterns.

fall. Once he tried it, and once the superb structure but partially yielded to his boisterous assaults. He returned to the charge, and the Collescum is, musically speaking, in seven flats.

Of course, such an event does not pass in Boston without occasioning in the newspapers many remarks, philosophical, humorous, historical, and moral. The poet of The Daity Advertiser tunes his harp as follows: "The 'wind it blew, The lumber flew, Be-'yond exeggests; And did not cease un-'til in peace, Nothing was left but 'pleces." The reader-will observe the joke on 'plecee, which is good, as well as the remark of The Advertiser that 'wind played an important part in the is the remark of The Adoptiser that wind played an important part in the history of the Collesum." Ah! if an enemy in New York had said this The Advertiser concludes: "The builders raised the wind, and the wind razed the building."

Your Majesty's Head to Meune.
Washington Correspondence Obicago Tribune.
General McCook, now Governor of Colorado, described to me the life he led as Minister at the Sandwich Islands, with his young and beautiful wife.
'All we did,' he said,' was to walk, every night, up a little strip of beach which led to a spot where we could look toward the United States. And we looked and we wished we were there!' McCook had been sent by Seward to trausact a big job in real estate—to buy the Sandwichers outright. The King, named, I think, Kokohammahamma, said; Your Majesty's Head to Bound.

General McCook, I like the Americans, and I know that we are powerless to hold these islands a day against any power, that in our inoffensive weakness lies onr independence; and really me and my people are fond of the American flag. But what is the use? Here I am a King, and I get forty thousand dollars a year. You would not want to pay me that in perpetuity, for it is more than you pay your President. I would have to be a clizon in America, and probably not a very distinguished citizen. So I think I had better be a King off here, Don't you? McCook says he looked at the guile less savage a minute, sitting there very fat and good humored, smoking his cheroot, and drinking a San Francisco cobbler, and he said, just orally; 'Your Msjesty! Your head's round.'
